CONFLICT MANAGEMENT

The word “conflict” tends to generate images of anger, fighting, and other ugly thoughts that leave people bruised and beaten. Conflict isn’t uncommon, and it isn’t always good. But it isn’t always a bad thing, either. I’ll talk about a few tips I’ve read on how to manage conflict which I’ll share.

Accept Conflict: Conflict is a part of who we are, rather than getting depressed about it we should accept it and learn to manage it as its unavoidable.

Be a calming agent: Whether you’re listening to others’ or dealing with your own conflicts, your response can either increase or reduce the intensity of the issue. To be a calming agent, you need to logically approach both parties without bias and try to empathize with both when being a mediator.

Analyze the conflict: This helps to clarify the conflict. Some questions to ask are;

What triggered the conflict?

Who are you angry with?

What are you not getting that you want?

What are you afraid of losing?

Is your conflict/anger accurate or over exaggerated?

How can your conflict be resolved?.

Model neutral language: When people are in conflict they tend to use inflammatory language such as profanity, name calling, and exaggerations that escalate the conflict. Restate inflammatory language in a more objective way to help make the information less emotionally laden and more useful for future discussions.

Work together: For this to work we need to stop blaming each other and take ownership of the problem. Talk with each other regarding the issue and solve it with words rather than fists/violence.

These are just a few methods of managing conflicts.

My Views

Conflict occurs when people disagree, you can’t be human without having conflict. Because that’s where free will takes place and makes people differentiate. The people who win this are those who can work together by working towards their differences, resolving them to the state where both parties are satisfied and can therefore put their differences aside for a new tomorrow.

My Questions

Can a person who’s isolated experience conflict?

Is it possible to have conflict with one’s ownself?
