How do biological roles and gender roles compare and contrast?

Firstly, gender and sex are two different things where sex is the biological aspect of the human body which is determined at birth by one's reproductive organs. If one can give birth then that's a female no negotiation on that matter. But society labels humans as it sees and perceives them so gender is what the society judges, It's mainly how one looks like and how one behaves.

It is clear that biological roles are mainly for childbirth and procreation. On the other hand gender roles are what society dictates and thinks how one should behave and what is considered appropriate or expected for individuals based on their perceived gender identity. For instance, men are typically expected to be more forceful and to support the family, while women are historically expected to take up caring and nurturing duties in many communities.

Their origins and degrees of flexibility are where the two diverge. Gender roles are socially created, and may vary greatly among cultures, and are subject to change over time, and biological roles are innate and unchangeable.
